will let them into the Eastern Med to rout the Beds out. They have said as much. "Then we shall go there ourselves. It may take a while, but WE SHALL OVERCOME." "And the French, sir? What if they see that an anti-French?" "We can do nothing more than assure them with our word and reputation. We are out for action against the Russians. Just passing through, please." "And surrender?" "Till the Russians, when death with honor is inevitable, the wise man takes what he can get and lives to fight another day." Tich. Tich. Tich.

COBLITZIA (SMS) The attitude and tone of this crowd of Turkish citizens, estimated at over ten thousand, was one of grim determination as it watched Turkey's newest battle fleet prepare to sail yesterday.

The former battle cruiser Goeben, purchased from Germany and rechristened Yavuz, led an impressive line of sixteen Turkish warships, including two heavy cruisers, which stretched for two miles over the calm bay waters. The crowd roared its approval when the Yavuz let loose a deafening broadside from its main battery of twelve-inch guns in the traditional Turkish Naval salute which is given before its fleets go into battle.

The fleet is reported to be headed for the Aegean Sea, where Turkish naval forces are expected to contest the outer Greek islands with the Austrian naval contingent. There was no official confirmation of this from Turkish naval authorities, but the likelihood of such an engagement seems high in the light of the recent deterioration of relations between Turkey and the Dual-Monarchy.

It was long expected that Austria would cede the strategically important Greek position to the Turks, in exchange for Turkey's support of its assault on the Italian provinces around Venice. But then, in October, Austria not only reneged on this promise to Turkey, but turned around and destroyed Turkey's lone army of occupation in Bulgaria in a surprise attack.

Relations between the two powers are said to have broken down completely since this Austrian move, and, though a state of war has not been officially declared by either country, further hostilities between Austria and Turkey seem all but certain.

Experts agree that it is now problematical whether or not Austria is strong enough to continue its war with Italy without Turkey's support. Indeed, should relations between Turkey and Italy normalize as a result of Austria's attack on Turkey--a possibility that some onlookers are fully expecting--a full-blown war for possession of the Balkans could be the result.

Should this occur, the complications for the eastern powers would be hard to calculate.

The burgeoning alliance between England and Germany has all but sealed the fate of the outnumbered French forces. With Paris fallen, and Marseilles threatened, France is expected to sue for peace and get the best terms it can. This would leave England's fleet free to threaten the Mediterranean while Germany moved on Austria through the Tyrolian and Bohemian Alps. It is expected that France would be coerced into attacking Italy as a diversion.

Russia, which at one time might have proved capable of striking a strategic balance, is now widely thought to have been a paper tiger all along, and is in no position to seriously affect the course of events in the east. Turkey has, reportedly, extended an offer to help Russia retake Moscow from the Germans, but according to sources the Tsar has refused to accept Turkey's assistance.

This has fueled rumors that Russia might be working with Austria in an effort to wrest control of Sevastopol from the Turks. While this move would leave the rest of Russia open to further German aggression, Turkish authorities have taken the threat seriously, and have placed the fortress garrison on full alert, while a fleet is being prepared to render assistance from the Black Sea.

Turkish authorities have said repeatedly that unless Austria immediately relinquishes control of both Greece and Bulgaria, war between the two former allies would be inevitable.

"Austria's sense of survival seems to have once again been eaten away by its traditional greed for the Balkans," a Turkish ministry spokesman said. "It's unthinkable that Austria would consider fighting both Italy and us simultaneously, but apparently those are its plans.

"Our great fear at the moment is that the Kaiser will guarantee Austria its northern flank in exchange for a free hand in Russia. This would, I'm afraid, put our country in a position from which there would be no turning back from war."

When asked, should Austria and Germany agree on a non-aggression pact, if this would influence Turkish negotiations with Italy, the minister stated:

"I think it must be obvious to everyone that Turkey will do whatever it must to ensure the safety of its lands and its people. We have been in contact with the Italians for some weeks now, but I'm unable to disclose the nature of our talks at this time. I can say that both our governments are alarmed by Austria's recent actions, and all possible steps are being taken."

The Italian government has refused substantive comment on its intentions, especially regarding its negotiations with Turkey, though it is widely believed its government is still exploring the possibility of arranging a general cease-fire with both Austria and Turkey. The general feeling is that its attitude towards Turkey has thawed some in the past month, while its relations with Austria remain critical.

In spite of its declared peace posture, Italy's armies and fleets are readying themselves for the defence of Venice against the impending Austrian attack, and the prospects for an early cessation of hostilities do not appear strong.
